The constitution requires the Legislature to do one thing during their annual 60-day session—pass a budget. Well, sixty days are up on Friday, and right now it appears this task will not be completed within that time.

Budget negotiators have settled on the amount of money they have to spend, but they are bogged down on how to allocate those dollars between education, health and human services, environmental protection, and state employee salaries, to name but a few. Senate President Jim King and House Speaker Johnnie Byrd talked this weekend in an effort to work out these details. But as of late Sunday afternoon, they hadn’t been able to resolve any of these matters. Once they do come to a compromise, the Florida Constitution requires the budget to “cool” for 72 hours (to allow legislators to review it) before either chamber can vote on it. That means agreement would have to be reached by Tuesday night for this session to end on time. Since this, seemingly, is unlikely, the House and Senate leadership has already indicated that the session will extend for an additional week, until May 10.

The SUS’s substantive legislation is poised and ready to pass this week, and move on to the Governor. Included in the House and Senate bills are several “glitch” items, such as workers’ comp and pre-tax benefits language, as well as non-glitch items like an admissions deposit, residency for purposes of tuition requirements, limits to the Major Gifts program, and new UMIFA language. In addition, the CLEP mandate for Bright Futures students is expected to be repealed, and the university building naming bill, and legislation limiting university presidents’ salaries to $225,000 of state funds, are expected to pass this week.

In these final days (weeks?) of the Legislative Session, scenarios change rapidly and frequently.
